The spout is open and trough-like, rising sharply and terminating with a molded lip. A high-arching handle runs from the shoulder to the back of the mouth, where it is flanked by molded concentric circles. The elegant, offset neck is attached to a wide flat shoulder, the body fairly deep and rounded towards the stepped foot. The surface covered is a black glaze, including the conical underside of the foot. Intact, with a small area of damage to the glazed caused during the firing process.

This is a particularly elegant example. Compare Corpus Vasorum Antiquorum, Oxford, Ashmolean 1, 1, 34, pl.(134) 42.6.
